Herron Earns His Place With Greatest Linksmen; Barnes-Hagen Top "Pros"

Grantland Rice Ranks Leading Players Among Amateurs and Money Chasers; Places Evans and Ouimet in Tie for Third and Fourth

By Grantland Rice

The fiscal golfing year of 1919, the first year of renewed competition since the 1916 campaign, closes out in a day or two with ranking arguments still unsettled along both professional and amateur lines. In the professional field the main debate has been between Walter C. Hagen, open and metropolitan champion, and Jim Barnes, Western, Southern and

In the amateur field four names have been entered for the top. These four names are Herron, Evans, Ouimet and Jones.

So here we have six golfers in the two branches of service with their status still the subject of much impassioned oratory, but still an

Kirkby also defeated Herron by 5 to 4 in the Lestic Cup meeting.
Unfortunately neither Kirkby nor Legg qualified in the Amateur champiouship, always the year's single grantest test.

As a matter of complicated record, the ranking after fourth place becomes entirely too complex to be followed. Max Marston played good golf and so did 10b Gardner. So, for that matter, did Rody Knepper, Jimmy Manion and several others.

Whitney, Kirkby, Gardner, Marston among others, are well grouped. It would be impossible to give Jerry Travers any ranking, even among the first ten, as he played in but one tournament the Amateur and was badly beaten in his first match. His

The First Four

If we had to attempt a ranking of the first four, we should place Herron first not only because he won the Amateur championship, but because for the six days of play—match or medal—he played the best golf in the tournament with the best field in America phosing him.

More people played lawn tennis in 1919 than in any other year since the inception of the game in this country, it being estimated that the total was close to 2,000,000, and all this is taken as an indication of the giant proportions the sport will assume in 1920, when the United States will challenge again for the Davis Cup.
